Health is Best Assurance Of Successful School Year

Best of all assurance that the child will have a successful school year, is good health. Without it he may be handicapped in absorbing carefully prepared instruction despite the fact that the capacity for learning is there. Without it, he becomes more susceptible to the illness of childhood which all too often bring interruptions to his school attendance with serious impairment of progress. This is why the wise parents schedule complete physical examinations with special attention to eyes, tests and immunizations for their children, in advance of the opening of the school term.

This year with the advent of the new Salk vaccine, there is the promise of greater security for all against the most dreaded of all diseases to endanger the physical well being of school age children. Though your children may not as yet have been inoculated, they stand to benefit from the fact that thousands of others have been, authorities believe, because the incidence of the disease will have been reduced. The progress in the battle against polio is especially welcome this year because of a overcrowding of classrooms as the result of enrollments that are increasing more rapidly than the facilities to take care of the youngsters.

Health examinations given children by the schools after enrollment are no substitute for the intimate professional attention they get from the family physician. They are not supposed to be. Although school health examinations are compulsory in some 28 states, and many school systems in other states provide them voluntarily, many parents neglect to follow up the school physicians findings. The most universally neglected health defect today is reported to be tooth decay which means distracting pain and sometimes more serious difficulties for the school child.

More parents than ever, fortunately, are conscious of the vision problems of the children, which, though not always requiring glasses for correction, must have professional attention to make certain the youngster reads with comfort and ease. Parents also are becoming more conscious of the need for having hearing checked. Best assurance of good health for your child, which in turn is basic to a successful career of learning, is to provide for pre-school term check ups. With the new school term but a few weeks away, appointments should be made now.
